Bilateral Donors and the Age of the National Interest: What Prospects for Challenge by Development Agencies?

NILIMA GULRAJANI*

Overseas Development Institute, London, UK
Global Economic Governance Programme, Oxford University, UK

Summary. — Foreign aid agencies represent and champion global development priorities within a donor nation. Increasingly however, these agencies sit within donor governments that are strongly committed to upholding the national interest through their development commitments. This paper is concerned with how bilateral aid agencies manage this tension and how they might continue to serve the altruistic aims of development. The main research question asks, if autonomy—or a combination of autonomies—can improve a development agency’s ability to defend the humanitarian imperative of development against normative pressures privileging the national interest?

In this paper, we explore the possibility that the development agency maintains returns of aid provision to the donor-nation. To do this, we pressurise development agencies to demonstrate concrete positive development impacts. Our findings suggest that while structural autonomy is critical for preserving humanitarian motivations, there are also unexplored opportunities within other autonomous spheres. A multi-dimensional examination of autonomy highlights the varying capacity that development agencies have to resist pressures to strongly nationalize the global development project.

Key words — national interest, aid bureaucracy, donors, development agencies, autonomy, public management

1. INTRODUCTION

The international development agency is an unusual beast. It is charged with delivering assistance to people outside its borders but must do so within government structures whose purpose it is to uphold the national interest. In other words, it must simultaneously be doting mother hen to the wider animal kingdom and defensive lioness to her own pride. This conundrum is at the heart of the challenge of strengthening the development agency in an environment that increasingly frames development in terms of domestic priorities. Dual imperatives challenge development agencies sitting at the crossroads of these disparate norms for aid-giving. How are these tensions balanced? What can their response be?

Our starting point for answering these questions is that the main development agency of a donor country bears significant responsibility toward the welfare of non-nationals. We define a development agency as the primary organization delegated with responsibility for Official Development Assistance (ODA) or, more colloquially, foreign aid. The purpose of this paper is to understand if it is possible to hold steadfast to ambitious development aims in the post-MDG period as pressures mount on agencies to demonstrate concrete positive returns of aid provision to the donor-nation. To do this, we explore the possibility that the development agency maintains a degree of independence from the norms of the national interest. In this case, it is public management that provides a theoretical framework for the analysis that follows, particularly literatures concerned with organizational autonomy. This paper is thus situated within “the bureaucratic turn” in studies of foreign aid (Arel-Bundock, Atkinson, & Potter, 2015; Bebbington, Guggenheim, Olson, & Woolcock, 2004; Cornell, 2014; Easterly, 2002; Gibson, Andersson, Ostrom, & Shivakumar, 2005; Gulrajani, 2014, 2015; Lewis et al., 2003; Martens, 2005; Mosse, 2005; Pritchett & Woolcock, 2004; Quarles van Ufford, 1988). Describing this flourishing body of literature, Yanguas and Hulme (2015, pp. 210, 216) suggest it is partly united in its interest in the administrative constraints inherent to aid bureaucracies. In this paper, a holistic examination of development agencies’ autonomy uncovers both the constraints on and opportunities for advancing the ethical imperative of development at time when it is strongly challenged by national interest norms.

Our hypothesis for the paper is that even as bilateral development agencies are pressured to advance domestic interests and, in many cases, display a willingness to do so, they also have opportunities to preserve a more selfless commitment to development. By examining the different spheres of autonomy of a development agency, one can begin to understand and compare how well adapted an agency is to protect and champion a robust global development agenda from dilution by national prerogatives. Analysis of the various dimensions of autonomy is illustrated through narrative case studies of Norway, Sweden, and the United Kingdom—all high-performing donors but also all susceptible to populist pressures that seek to further domestic interests through development policy. Our findings suggest that there is unevenness among these actors’ ability to challenge the norms of the national interest and that spheres of autonomy provide leverage to a development agency seeking to defend a principled approach.

* I would like to thank the Overseas Development Institute, the Global Economic Governance Programme at Oxford University and the British Academy for their support of this research. Many thanks are also due to all the agency officials who agreed to be interviewed for this research. Linnea Mills, Sebastien Dibling, Caroline Laroche and Anna Minayasan assisted with research assistance over the length of the project, for which many thanks are owed. A draft version of this paper benefited greatly from suggestions from Tim Forsyth, Scott Fritzen, Mikaela Gavas, Emily Jones, Martin Lodge, Bryn Welham and Alexa Zeitz. Final revision accepted: March 13, 2017. to development. Overall, the paper concludes that a nuanced consideration of development agency autonomy may offer some prospects for a development project that is not overwhelmingly colonized by nationalistic ambition.

2. THE CHANGING ENVIRONMENT FOR BILATERAL DONORS: AN AGE OF THE NATIONAL INTEREST

These are challenging times for bilateral donors. Responsibility for Official Development Assistance (ODA) may be a task that unites all development agencies but it is one that is dwindling in importance and popularity. ODA is not only falling relative to other flows of development finance like FDI and remittances, it is also falling in absolute terms, with a 12% real drop in total ODA disbursed during 2014-15 (OECD, 2016). Meanwhile, popular support for development spending diminishes as domestic austerity measures fuel the perception that aid is provided at the expense of the poor at home (Heinrich, Kobayashi, & Bryant, 2016; Lancaster, 2007). Against a backdrop of widening intra-country inequality, even respectable voices call for foreign aid flows focusing on domestic problems of exclusion rather than exotic locations overseas (Deaton, 2016). Meanwhile, growth rates in many middle-income countries will soon make these states ineligible for concessional ODA flows (Sumner, 2013). Many of these “emerging powers” possess their own aid programs, resulting in an enlarged pool of development agencies that increasingly compete with traditional donors for the attention of Southern client states (Krangelud, 2011; Swedlund, 2017).

The working assumption of this paper is that such global trends are shaping the wider normative environment within which the development agency is embedded by fueling domestic political pressures to deliberately exploit aid to promote the national interest. Thus, we subscribe to the view that while the act of aid-giving can be motivated by both altruistic and national interest, these motivations are strongly associated with the possibility of tensions and tradeoffs. For example, national imperatives are shown to affect aid allocation by misdirecting funds to states and sectors on non-development grounds (Girod, 2008; Reddy & Minoiu, 2009; Steele, 2011). Bilateral aid that rewards particular political positions, for example voting behavior in the UN Security Council, is demonstrably less effective at achieving development impact (Dreher, Eichenauer, & Gehring, 2016). Conversely, where donors’ interests in aid recipients are non-strategic, it is empirically shown to be more conducive to robust development outcomes (Girod, 2012). Overall, donor motives are strongly shown to influence aid’s effectiveness, withgeostrategic motives shown to be ill-disposed to development impact (Kilby & Dreher, 2010; Stone, 2010).

If humanitarian and national interests are the yin and yang of development cooperation, where does the balance sit in current contemporary policy space? It is a key argument of the paper that balance has shifted in the post-MDG period to service donor interests above developmental ones, creating a fine balancing act for development agencies.

If the national interest is a permanent undercurrent at play in foreign aid, there are times and places where it has certainly been diminished. For example, the period between the Cold War and the War on Terror is viewed as a low point for the influence of foreign policy objectives on development (Fleck & Kilby, 2010; Stone, 2010). For many observers, the new millennium also marked a high watermark for developmental motivations, oriented toward the mission of global poverty eradication (Maxwell, 2003; Noel, 2006; Payne, 2006). The re-discovery of global poverty as an area of common convergent international concern reified in the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs), an integrative framework that came to embody the benign humane face of the aid project. While some suggested this period represented a continuity of neoliberal prescriptions and intrusions linked to the national interest (Craig & Porter, 2003; Porter & Craig, 2004), there...
دریافت فوری متن کامل مقاله

امکان دانلود نسخه تمام متن مقالات انگلیسی
امکان دانلود نسخه ترجمه شده مقالات
پذیرش سفارش ترجمه تخصصی
امکان جستجو در آرشیو جامعی از صدها موضوع و هزاران مقاله
امکان دانلود رایگان ۲ صفحه اول هر مقاله
امکان پرداخت اینترنتی با کلیه کارت های عضو شتاب
دانلود فوری مقاله پس از پرداخت آنلاین
پشتیبانی کامل خرید با بهره مندی از سیستم هوشمند رهگیری سفارشات