Abstract

Using international data from 49 countries, we examine how director busyness affects global compensation. Prior literature reports conflicting evidence regarding the effect that multiple directorships has on firm value and performance. Some studies find that busy directors have skills and connections that benefit the firm while other research concludes that busy directors are too distracted to provide adequate monitoring. We determine that busy directors receive higher total compensation which is consistent with their greater skills and extensive networks. Busy directors, however, receive a significantly higher
