19 Abstract

20 The aim of this study was to assess street food vendors' hygienic practices in four 21 Asian and the EU countries according to the Codex code of practice general principles on 22 food hygiene and other relevant documents and observations and to provide information that 23 may clarify certain misconceptions on hygienic practices related to street food. The materials 24 were 440 street food vendors in China, Thailand, Greece and Poland. Specially designed 25 questionnaire allowed fast data collection. Many non-compliances in the hygienic practices
26 was found. Hygiene requirements in section of hygiene of equipment and food preparation 27 and serving were better implemented than in personal hygiene. In surveyed EU countries, 28 hygiene of equipment and food preparation generally showed higher conformity than in Asian 29 countries. However, the most complete implementation of the principles of personal hygiene 30 was shown for Thailand. The level of fulfillment of the hygienic requirements was most 31 strongly influenced by the type of street food vendor, both in the section of personal hygiene 32 and hygiene of equipment and food preparation and serving. The results of this work should 33 not discourage to eat street food, but to support the reasonable choice of eating-places, 34 according to basic food hygiene knowledge, to minimize food poisoning risk.
